BACKGROUND:
Obstructive Sleep Apnea (OSA) is a disorder manifest by repetitive episodes of either complete upper airway obstruction (apnea) or partial upper airway obstruction (hypopnea) during sleep. Untreated OSA is considered to be a potentially reversible contributing factor for hypertension, heart attacks, strokes, atrial fibrillation, sudden death, diabetes, excessive daytime sleepiness, motor vehicle accidents, impaired cognitive functioning and decreased quality of life.^{1,2} Nasal continuous positive airway pressure (NCPAP) has long been considered to be the gold standard of treatment for OSA. However, a significant percentage of patients either do not tolerate NCPAP or are noncompliant with NCPAP. A variety of oral appliances and surgical procedures have been developed as alternative treatments to NCPAP. However, the results of these appliances and/or surgical procedures have been unpredictable and generally far less successful than NCPAP.³

Nasal expiratory positive airway pressure (EPAP) marketed as Provent Therapy (Ventus Medical Inc, Belmont, CA) is a single use EPAP device containing a mechanical valve with a very low inspiratory resistance but a high expiratory resistance applied to each nostril with adhesive to provide a seal (figures 1&2).⁴ Several recent studies have documented the effectiveness of EPAP in the treatment of OSA.^{5,6}
